ON has been recognized as a painful, debilitating, and debilitating disease that affects millions of people and can be diagnosed using magnetic resonance imaging (MRI). Symptoms include pain and swelling, and may be debilitating. There are no effective treatments and there is currently no known cause for the disease. We propose to develop an MRI-compatible, intra-articular knee brace that will lower the joint load and shock that lead to ON by dissipating the mechanical energy in the joints and redistributing it to the surrounding bone. With low-intensity exercise, the placebo brace provides the same protective effect on the joint as the physical brace. Compared with a normal running gait, the placebo brace reduces the load on the joint by 60% and reduces the joint stress by 80%. With both physical and placebo braces, it is likely that the joint load and shock will be reduced by 85% and symptoms can be delayed or prevented. To evaluate the effect of the brace on the progression of ON, subjects with ON will be randomized to either placebo or physical brace treatment for a 6-month study, during which they will have a series of advanced MRI tests performed on their knee joints. A major innovation of this study is the ability to perform MRI imaging while subjects wear the brace and exercise on a device that simultaneously simulates the range of motion, load, and accelerations present during normal gait. Additionally, we will track the subjects' physical activity levels through self-reports and accelerometer devices. It is anticipated that the results of this study will elucidate the mechanisms by which a knee brace may be protective against primary ON and may reveal if prolonged physical activity has a protective effect. It is also expected that the data will provide preliminary evidence for the potential of an intra-articular knee brace to prevent secondary ON in individuals with knee injuries or arthritis who are not currently considered for treatment because of the asymptomatic, small, low-risk size of the lesions. PUBLIC HEALTH RELEVANCE: Osteonecrosis of the knee is a debilitating disease and a major public health problem. This is the first study to test a proposed MRI-compatible intra-articular knee brace that will lower the joint load and shock that lead to the disease and may provide an early warning for people at risk. A Chromebook is a computer that is exclusively designed for web browsing. Chromebooks are preloaded with free antivirus software and are usually very affordable. Because of this, many businesses are switching over to them in place of traditional desktop computers. And then again, Chromebooks are not cheap and require a full internet connection, so they are not so ideal for small businesses. A small business will require an inexpensive and versatile device that can run Windows as well. Today, we will show you how to convert any Windows laptop into a desktop computer. You will learn how to build a powerful desktop computer that can run Windows 10 and much more. This tutorial is going to be a quick and easy DIY project. All you need is a computer and a couple of other things to build a new computer. Building A Desktop Computer For Windows From Scratch Step 1. You will need a motherboard, CPU, RAM, Hard Disk and power supply. An idea is that you get a motherboard that is compatible with your CPU and RAM that you are planning to use. Step 2. If you are using a motherboard that is compatible with your CPU, you will not have to purchase a CPU and RAM. A motherboard is already compatible with the CPU and RAM that you are using. Step 3. Now, you will need to purchase Hard Disks and power supplies. This is because you are going to use your computer as a desktop, so you will need a hard disk. Also, you will need a power supply to run the computer because it will use a lot of power. Step 4. You will need a system enclosure that will hold all the parts that you will be using. This way, you can keep everything
